For Tyler Donner, owner of Extreme Fabrication Racing LLC, growth has always been the driving force behind his business. What started as a passion for high-performance machines has evolved into a thriving manufacturing company that produces aftermarket ATV and UTV parts. Based in the community where Tyler grew up, Extreme Fabrication Racing continues to build on a local legacy of entrepreneurship. "This is where I grew up and where my family has owned businesses for generations," Donner shared.

With a team of 17 employees — and plans to expand — Extreme Fabrication Racing stands out as a niche manufacturer in an industry where few specialize in the kind of custom, high-quality work they do. Donner's favorite part about running his business is simple yet meaningful: providing jobs and opportunities within his hometown.

Like many growing businesses, the journey hasn't been without its challenges. "Consistent growth" has been one of the biggest hurdles, Donner noted, but one that he has tackled head-on by "creating new products and expanding into different industries." That innovative mindset has helped Extreme Fabrication Racing continue to move forward in an ever-evolving market.

The Revolving Loan Fund (RLF) program has also played a key role in the company's success. Donner credits the program with "providing the necessary funding required" to fuel expansion and meet increasing demand. The support has allowed Extreme Fabrication Racing to invest in equipment, create new products, and add more jobs — strengthening both the business and the local economy.

As for others considering starting a business, Donner's advice is clear: "Find mentors. Do lots of research." His story — one of steady growth, community roots, and smart financial partnerships — shows how determination and the right resources can help a small-town business make a big impact.
